But there are some borders we don’t always see—either because they lie far away from us or because they aren’t visible on any map. Part of the Figge’s work is presenting world-class exhibitions that broaden our view of our world, fostering empathy and understanding for those whose lives seem remote from ours, literally or figuratively.

Our upcoming exhibition Border Cantos | Sonic Borders, which you can read about in more detail in the pages that follow, is one example of this work in action. Through photography, sculpture, and sound, artists Richard Misrach and Guillermo Galindo shed light on the lives of the thousands of people who cross the Mexican-American border each year in search of brighter futures. By engaging with these artworks and the stories they tell, we have the chance to reflect on the immigration stories that are part of our histories and grow our capacity for compassion for anyone in our community whose backgrounds or experiences don’t match our own.

Exhibitions aren’t the only way the Figge bridges borders though. We also do it through our outreach programs, which bring art beyond the museum’s walls and into local schools, libraries, homeless shelters, and the juvenile detention center. These programs don’t just break down the divide between art and those who may not have access to it. They also help equip students with the skills, from collaboration to critical thinking and creative expression, that will support them in pursuing their own goals—and that will contribute to a more connected, welcoming, and inclusive region.

From exhibitions to outreach, your support makes this work possible. After all, it’s only by joining together that we can create a community where all of our perspectives, needs, and interests have a place. As we renew our commitment to our mission this new year, thank you for sharing in that vision.

Border Cantos | Sonic Borders

Katz Gallery

Border Cantos | Sonic Borders humanizes the Mexican-American border, inviting visitors to engage with the complex—and often misunderstood—experiences of those seeking a better life in the United States. Spanning photography, sculpture, and sound, the exhibition offers the Quad Cities community a vital opportunity to come together with empathy, understanding, and connection.

Border Cantos | Sonic Borders is organized by Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art, Bentonville, Arkansas. Support for the national tour of Border Cantos | Sonic Borders is provided by Art Bridges.

Out of sight, out of mind? With stories from the Mexican-American border not always part of the daily news cycle, the lived realities of the thousands of migrants seeking a better life in the United States often go unknown, unacknowledged, or unconsidered by many in the Quad Cities community.

Border Cantos | Sonic Borders, a new exhibition opening February 19 at the Figge, brings some of those narratives to light.
A collaboration between American photographer Richard Misrach and Mexican-American artist and composer Guillermo Galindo, Border Cantos | Sonic Borders explores the complexities of the southern border through photography, sculpture, and sound, inviting us to bridge boundaries and initiate important conversations.

“To me, the work I do is a means of interpreting unsettling truths, of bearing witness, and of sounding an alarm,” Misrach told the Aperture Foundation in an interview. “The beauty of formal representation both carries an affirmation of life and subversively brings us face to face with news from our besieged world.”

Both artists address fraught topics touching on politics, the environment, and humanitarian issues. Misrach is well known for his expansive images focusing on the ways humans interact with and impact the natural world, while Galindo is inspired by the Mesoamerican belief that one can bring out the spiritual essence of an object’s past. Galindo’s 260-minute composition Sonic Borders, which can be heard playing within the gallery, employs eight musical instruments the artist created from objects discarded near the border.

Together, the photographs, objects, and sonic composition introduce distinct yet interrelated ways of experiencing the human consequences of immigration policies. By offering evidence of those who have journeyed through the borderlands in pursuit of their hopes and dreams, Misrach and Galindo encourage empathy for the plight of migrants everywhere.

While some may think of the border as a place where politics and culture collide in sometimes tragic ways, this exhibition seeks to share firsthand accounts from the people who have traversed it. “We’re artists; we’re not politicians,” Galindo has said of his collaboration with Misrach. “We want to give people the experience of the border, and to get acquainted with the immigrants’ journey. To make it palpable. To make it human.”

The Quad Cities community will be encouraged to engage with Border Cantos | Sonic Borders by sharing experiences, stories, and perspectives of the timely and complex social issue of immigration. In this way, this exhibition seeks to foster cultural connections and humanize these difficult topics.

“Immigrants have played an important role in the Quad Cities’ history, and the region is home to tens of thousands of immigrants, refugees, and migrants today who help support the economy,” says Michelle Hargrave, the museum’s executive director and CEO. “It is vital we share this exhibition with our community and we hope that through the power of art, we will facilitate greater understanding and empathy and a healthy exchange of ideas among Quad Citizens of all backgrounds.”

The Figge’s director of education, Melissa Mohr, is looking forward to several interactive public programs accompanying the exhibition. “We want to provide a visitor experience that emphasizes what we have in common,” Mohr says.

“We will be collecting messages of kindness from community members and printing them on foam bricks that will be used to build wall structure. Community members will be invited to take out the bricks, read them, and keep them as a connection to the exhibition and to the museum—a connection that is hopefully personally meaningful. It is a way for the community to work together to dismantle a wall that divides us and focus on the messages that unite us.”

Simple Pleasures: The Art of Doris Lee

Gildehaus Gallery and Third Floor Gallery

Born in Aledo, Illinois, Doris Lee was one of the most recognized artists in the country during the 1930s and 1940s and a leading figure at the Woodstock Art Colony. In response to the rise of abstract expressionism, Lee deftly absorbed artistic innovations into a continuation of her own visual style. Now, a new exhibition of her body of work, Simple Pleasures, reveals her remarkable ability to merge abstraction with the appeal of the everyday, offering a distinctive visual identity that successfully bridged various artistic “camps” that arose in the post–World War II era.

Simple Pleasures presents the first major critical assessment of Lee’s works and will include over 70 works by the artist spanning the 1930s through the 1960s from both public and private collections. The exhibition features paintings, drawings, prints, and commercial designs in fabric and pottery. A selection of ephemera, such as product advertisements by companies that commissioned images from Lee, will also be included. A richly illustrated, full-color catalogue with four essays accompanies the exhibition and will be available in the museum store.

42nd Rock Island Art Guild Fine Arts Exhibition
Fourth Floor Gallery

The Rock Island Art Guild Fine Arts Exhibition has been organized by the Guild since 1970 and hosted for the last six years by the Figge Art Museum. This year, artists living within 200 miles of the Figge working in any medium, including sound, performance, video, painting, sculpture, and works on paper, were invited to apply and submit up to three works for consideration. Susan Watts, owner and director of Olson–Larson Galleries in Des Moines, selected the works for the exhibition and chose this year’s award winners. Awards for first and second place, the Sally MacMillan Watercolor Award, the Founder’s Award, the Zeivel Harris Sculpture Award, and the Honorable Mention Award will be presented on March 3. There will also be a new $300 New Media Award presented to an artist working in video, sound, or digital art. Don’t miss out on the opportunity to help select the People’s Choice Award and Children’s Choice Award winners. Come cast your vote for your favorite work!

This exhibition is made possible through the generous sponsorship of the Rock Island Art Guild.

The Figge’s amazing photography collection continues to grow with the addition of important works by some of the most significant photographers of our time. The New Photography exhibition series provides a brief survey of the collection’s growth and permits us to share with the Quad Cities community some of our newly acquired gems.

This spring, New Photography will feature the work of such acclaimed 20th-century masters as Douglas Prince and Terry Evans as well as recent works by Cara Romero, Victoria Sambunaris, Johnnie Chatman, Rebecca Norris Webb, and Karin Apollonia Müller. From the real to the surreal, the exhibition will highlight photography’s continued ability to engage, inform, and amaze.

Corn Zone
Mary Waterman Gildehaus Gallery

This Figge visitor favorite features a “corn field” installation of oversize blown glass ears of corn carefully suspended from the museum’s ceiling with rope. The exhibition explores the fragility of glass, the story of corn, and contemporary issues in farming, including genetic modification. Meilahn’s bright and cheerfully colored art tells a farming story, both fruitful and dangerous, and underscores the significance of agricultural science in modern farming.

Meet outreach and community engagement coordinator Laura Wriedt

In this staff spotlight, Laura Wriedt shares her thoughts on how outreach makes an impact, what she’s looking forward to this winter and spring, and why she’s excited about our new outreach program for at-risk students at Rock Island High School.
Almost a decade ago, Laura joined the Figge to continue the Big Picture program. Today she’s the museum’s outreach and community engagement coordinator, a position that enables her to share her passion for education while connecting students to the importance of art.

It’s hard to believe it’s been nearly 10 years! What have you learned working at the Figge?

Art is truly in all aspects of life. I love enlightening students to how art ties into history, science, math—all subjects. Most importantly, students understand that art is a safe yet powerful form of expression.

How do you approach outreach in the Quad Cities community?

I cannot tell you how many times teachers worried about certain students with behavior issues acting out during a visit—and it always ended up that those were the exact students who embraced the lesson the most. There is something that “clicks” when we give permission for individuals to be creative in a safe environment.

In understanding this, it’s important to identify areas of need within the community where we can make this happen beyond the classroom. I’m always willing to investigate the issues in our community to see how art can bring a healing component to resolve them. Social justice programs, programs serving those in compromised living situations, programs for individuals with a disability—they all matter.

What art connections will you focus on through outreach as we delve into upcoming exhibitions?

Our education team has come up with innovative ideas to bring awareness to immigration issues through Border Cantos | Sonic Borders. Ideas like building a “welcome wall,” as opposed to one that creates a barrier, is something that we can bring into classrooms. Participants will have opportunities to share some of their own personal stories or experiences they have witnessed in relation to border issues. It’s my hope that this exhibition will lead those we reach through the Big Picture program to acknowledge the hardships of those right here in our own community and help grow compassion and empathy.

What impact do you hope the Figge’s outreach programs will have on participants?

I want each and every person I see in outreach to understand that whatever it is they have to contribute artistically is valid. A creative mind shapes who we are, so it’s important to let go of worry or judgment. When they feel stuck, I tell students to pay attention to their “art-brain” for the answers. So many of us are programmed to follow one prescribed way of approaching creativity because it feels “safe.” Artists are people who let go of the idea of being judged from the outside and celebrate a passion, no matter what it stirs up.

The Figge is a place where there will always be an opportunity to ask and learn about why art happens. I have experienced this firsthand in our pilot program at Rock Island High School. Students who have been identified as at risk of dropping out are learning about current issues like immigration and how artists create a voice for their passions. With outreach visits twice a week, these students are discovering new art mediums and exploring how different art styles speak to their interests. We do art journaling and introduce them to working artists to demonstrate the importance of getting to know what motivates us as creative people. Every month, students come to the Figge to do something hands-on and behind-the-scenes in our studios. So far, this program has been transformational. Already, we are seeing the outcomes we hoped for: an increase in student attendance and engagement—and a positive step toward a brighter future.
Albert Bierstadt, American, born Germany, 1830–1902, Bison Approaching a Water Hole, circa 1860, oil on paper on canvas, gift of Jane and George Vieth, 2021.3
The Figge is pleased to announce the acquisition of Bison Approaching a Water Hole (circa 1860), a painting by the German-born American painter Albert Bierstadt (1830–1902). Bierstadt’s name is synonymous with grand, breathtaking paintings of the American wilderness. Glaciated mountain tops, shimmering lakes, and vast canyons populate the most famous of his works, many of which took their inspiration from his travels in the American West, including an 1859 U.S. Government survey to the Wyoming and Oregon territories to chart a proposed route for the Union Pacific Railroad.

The painting is a gift of Jane and George Vieth, Davenport residents and long-time museum supporters. Jane’s mother received it from another Davenport family, John (Johann) and Hulda (Johanna) Kohrs, relatives of Conrad Kohrs, the “Cattle King” who ranched in the protected valleys of western Montana. During his life, Kohrs amassed a fortune and, in addition to the Grant-Kohrs Ranch National Historic Site in Deer Lodge, Montana, owned a palatial home in Helena.

Sadly, cattle effectively replaced the majestic bison like those in this painting, which were brought to near extinction in the 1870s. Beginning in the 1860s, bison were hunted for sport with the tacit support of the U.S. Army as a means of settling what General Philip Sheridan termed the “vexed Indian question.” By depriving Native Americans of an important food and spiritual resource, the way was made for the expansion of the railroads and settlement of the prairies and plains. The West’s fragile and complex history, largely glossed over by Hollywood, can be glimpsed in paintings like this one.

By the time of his death, Bierstadt’s art had fallen out of favor, the grandest of his paintings being too “theatrical” for contemporary tastes, which had shifted, somewhat ironically, toward the European preference for more colorful, impressionistic landscapes. Visitors can see Bison Approaching a Water Hole in the museum’s permanent collection galleries beginning in early March 2022.

Growing the endowment

Through our donors' generous contributions, the Figge was able to partner with Spring Forward last summer to create special art kits for at-risk students in Rock Island and Milan. The kits provided art materials and access to fun instructional videos to 4,000 students—almost double the number served last year and far exceeding the number the museum engaged through similar programs before the pandemic.

"The Rock Island-Milan School District is extremely fortunate to have the outstanding partnership of the Figge Art Museum," said assistant superintendent Kathy Ruggeberg, Ph.D. "Throughout the years, the partnership has grown to include students of all ages. We are lucky to have not only field trip opportunities but also additional resources through out-of-school-time learning, in-class art lessons, art-enhanced curriculum development, the Young Artists Exhibition, and now a partnership with the Figge to use art to increase graduation rates for our high school students. The staff at the Figge are so responsive and creative."

Thanks to the generosity of the Moline Foundation, the impact of the Figge’s mission will go further in our community, especially with our partners in Illinois. That’s because we had the opportunity to be part of the foundation’s 2021 match challenge—a 2:1 match toward our endowment!

Figge outreach reaches new heights
The Moline Foundation was established in 1953 to encourage philanthropy and create opportunities to improve the quality of life for present and future generations in the Quad Cities area and surrounding region. With this mission in mind, the foundation generously created its match challenge for the sole purpose of helping grow endowment funds that serve the community’s needs in perpetuity.

“We are tremendously appreciative of contributions to this initiative to ensure our community can experience the power of art through world-class art exhibitions, educational programs, events, and more,” said Michelle Hargrave, the Figge’s executive director and CEO. “We are grateful to several Illinois families and businesses who have chosen to elevate this magnificent opportunity by becoming lead contributors making gifts totaling $20,000, doubling our impact.”

The Figge’s education programs serves over 50,000 individuals each year, with 52% in Iowa and 48% in Illinois. These important programs benefit over eight school districts, eight higher-educational institutions, and over 40 other educational partners, including the Scott County Juvenile Detention Center, the homeless shelter, Spring Forward, and many others.

Endowment support ensures the museum can continue—even during challenging times—to provide high-quality and accessible art education programs that encourage creativity, teach problem-solving, spark cultural connections, support critical thinking, and promote empathy in a safe environment.

Building a strong foundation together

Carlie Allison, the Figge’s new membership coordinator, shares her perspective on why membership matters.
As a native of the Quad Cities, I have always valued having a museum like the Figge in our community. It’s special to be able to experience well-known works of art just minutes from where I live!

The arts are one of the most vital aspects of a community’s growth—they promote what is special about us locally and connect us to one another around the globe. Membership to the Figge is the foundation for providing more opportunities to help our area thrive.

Figge members enjoy a number of benefits, from exclusive events and previews to discounts on classes and in the Museum Store. More importantly, though, membership to the Figge directly supports the Figge’s outreach to local schools, homeless shelters, detention centers, and more. It also provides necessary resources for the museum to bring exciting and diverse exhibitions to the Quad Cities.

Being a member of the Figge is a great way to be a part of something that makes a difference. I’m looking forward to getting to know the Figge’s current members and seeing them connect with others, learn from the various member programs we offer, and celebrate the arts in all forms.

I also hope to continue building awareness of the benefits of Figge membership through our partnerships with organizations across our community. I want to welcome new and diverse voices, not only in our exhibitions but also among our members, so we can continue bringing art and people together in creative ways. Not a member?
